INTRODUCTION

The armorial Urfé (URF) contains 2855 coats of arms in ancient blazon, which may be sequestered into 54 segments. The pages 9n1-24n8 with 269 items numbered 128-396 being the arms of english nobles and gentry. The URF was at one time also known as ‘Sicile’ from one of the putative editors, Jean Courtois dit heraut Sicile, and must not to be confused with the armorial designated ‘SIC’. 13 copies of the URF are known (Clemmensen OM). Several additional armorials, incl. Prinseault (PRT), Sicile (SIC), Charolais (CHA) and, in part, LeBlancq (LBQ), are derived fro the Urfé. The armorial is assumed to have been put into blazon around 1415, possibly by a wallon herald.

The basis of the present work is the transcription of a 15th century copy by H. Stanford London, with comments by Paul Adam-Even, in the ms.36307 of the Institut de Recherches d'Histoire des Textes in Paris. Michel Popoff has graciously allowed me to use his revised transcription as a basis for the edition and his numeration is used. The London numeration in this segment is 3 less than Popoff’s. London has added family names to some of the english items in his typewritten manuscript. Rendering the blazon in modern terms is problematic, due to the extensive use of internal references in the manuscript, e.g. telez armes a lambiaux [128]. If one of the copyists has missed an entry or transposed a legend or part of a blazon, a new, quite fictional, family or person might have been born. A dictionary form of modern english blazon is added, as is a heraldic table, index of names and a concordance between some armorials.

The Urfé has not been published in full, though parts are available (e.g. in Popoff A) and all arms can be found in Clemmensen OM. It appears, from literature, that the contents are the result of intermittent work from c.1380 until 1425. It must be of northern french origin, containing some 1340 french arms, 630 from the Low Countries, 350 british, 85 spanish and 69 polish arms. Besides the arms of contemporary persons, it has some inserts of older date, e.g. Ferry Paste S.Challeranges (d.1247), marêchal de France 1237 [47].

The english segment in the derivatives, Prinseault (PRT, segm. 30, 44 items from 247r, no.1159 on) and LeBlancq (LBQ, segm. 35, 98 items, from page 399, no.2951 on), might incorporate material from the english section of the Toison d’or (ETO-en, segm. 15).

The present, preliminary, edition is based on material immediately available, mainly some 133 items with similar arms and legends in the Willement Roll (S / WIL) and notes from a revision of Clemmensen OM. Using this assumes that the major part can be dated close to 1380, the early part or minority of the reign of Richard II (r.1377-1399). Though the overlap between URF-en and WIL is considerable, there is no concordance in sequence between the two. Curiously, there is a similar overlap of 136 items between URF-en and the large contemporary english ordinary, William Jenyns’ (WJ, 1611 items), which of course cannot be in concordance. However, it is interesting that the overlap viewed from URF is almost complete in URF:128-295 with most of the missing items coming singly or in twos and being problematic readings of the blazon or identification. Most of the remaining are also ‘continuous overlaps’, though with seven larger gaps of 5-8 items. This indicates that the URF could have been copied from one of the sources of WJ, and in any case the URF-en must have been copied from a contemporary english armorial. Getting the blazons and names of so many members of non prominent gentry would be almost impossible for a foreigner. There is no evidence that this armorial could come from any identifiable incident, and should be regarded as a short general armorial of english peers, knights and gentry without any clergymen nor commoners.
Before going into further analysis of the segment, one may note that the spelling of names are markedly ‘by ear’ and not readily identifiable. Though it might be a collation of contemporary people made (or copied) once, we may assume that the editor wanted to present an overview of English arms, including famous or extinct noble lines. The collator or editor apparently did not have too keen a knowledge of the English peerage system, though the overall structure is traditional, titled nobles followed by barons and knights and gentry, the barons are diluted by men of lesser status. At least the earls, no dukes are present, includes titles long out of use, e.g. Clare-Gloucester [143], Warenne [144] and Lacy-Lincoln [151].

In this paper, the term barons mean men summoned in person to Parliament, usually titled lords or sire in contemporary documents. Knights of the shire are noted as MP’s, and might not have been knighted. Titling in the manuscript appears to be consistent, but does not necessarily cover their actual status, some men were known as barons, other as lords. Also, several items are referred to as ‘family arms’ or by personal name, while others probably are given baronial status because they were prominent, e.g. Diggory Seys [392].

The 269 items may be partitioned into some 195 items for which persons living during the minority of Richard II can be assumed. The remaining 72 items includes 18 items attributable to families with no obvious activity during the minority period and 26 items for which information on the individuals are presently insufficient and 28 for which identification of arms-family relations is impossible or tenuous.

The activities of most of the families identified can be documented throughout the 13th to 15th centuries, but there is a small number of people, who only surfaces for a single generation or where the titulature-arms combination provides strong clues. One the former is Diggory Seys, o.s.p. 1390 [392], though the legend reads ‘sire de gonset’, the arms ‘d azur a tourtiaux d argent a chief d or a j lion’ are distinctive and well known from his seal. Though a notable captain, he was a man of small means as evidenced in the inquest of his widow, Radegund, in 1410. John Holand [140] was created E.Huntingdon in 1381, which gives an approximate starting date, supported by the creations of Thomas of Woodstock [132] as E.Buckingham in 1378 and John Mowbray [134] as Earl Marshal in 1379.

The finishing date must be very close to the above as several line became extinct around that time. The Ufford E.Suffolk [137] became extinct in 1382, Alan Buxhull [313] o.s.p.m. 1381 as did Giles Argentine [218]. Robert de la Mare [307] died in 1382 as did the last Say B.Say [170]. Using Say as an indicator is weak evidence as the arms and prerogatives was continued jure uxoris by some of brothers-in-law.

The conflicting evidence might be disposed of. Half of the 18 items belongs to earldoms which might have been included for completeness. One, the death of William Claxton [304] in 1379 might be attributed to the slowness of communications and that of John Mohun [344] in 1375 to misidentification. Similar arms were borne by Edmund Noon, king’s knight 1386 (S:555). For the remainder they could either be extinct peers included for prominence [160, 186, 226, 281, 358] or inserts of french origin [328].

From the above, it is most likely that the compilation was made during 1381.

129 les armes du roy sont esquarтелиes de France et d'Angleterre

3 fleurs-de-lis; 3 lions passant guard; =; = {BO, GO}

Either Richard II (r.1377-1399) or his grandfather, Edward III (r.1327-1377). Edward included the arms of France as a visual claim to the French throne during the early part of the Hundred Years' War. The quarters represent the ancient kingdoms of France and England as traditionally ranked. The variant of 3 fleurs-de-lis was introduced in France around 1380 and in England by 1403, though used before, e.g. on a regency seal in 1314 (XCF:86), and on another seal in 1343 (XCF:113).

Not the Prince of Wales, but John of Gaunt, 1340-1399, D.Lancaster, 3rd son of Edward III. Only 3 marriages were contracted between a prince of England and a princess of Castille, Edward I absorbed the Principality of Wales while King of England) and married to Eleanor of Castille (1242-1270). John of Gaunt married Constanza of Castille (1354-1394) in 1370, and his brother, Edmund of Langley [131], married her sister Isabella (1355-1393). Edward 'black' Prince of Wales, 1330-8.06.1376, married Joan 'fair maid' of Kent (d.1385). John of Gaunt bore France-England with a label per pale of France and Bretagne.

Earldom of Norfolk with the arms of Marshall. The first E.Norfolk, created 1141, was Hugh Bigod (d.1177), and the family held the title until the death s.p. of Roger (III) in 1306. With the death s.p. of Anselm Marshall E.Pembroke & Earl Marshal in 1245 the marshalate came to his nephew Roger (II, o.s.p.1270) and then to his nephew, Roger (III) who adopted the arms of Marshall as the arms of his office. The earldom and marshalate was held by Thomas of Brotherton, younger son of Edward I, during 1312-1338 and his arms then became the arms of the office of Earl Marshal of England [134]. The Norfolk title was dormant until revived in 1397 for Thomas Mowbray E.Nottingham created D.Norfolk. The arms of Bigod was {Or cross Gu}.

Earldom of Richmond with the arms of Dreux with canton of Bretagne. Alain 'le noir' (d.1146) was created E.Richmond 1136 and E.Cornwall 1140 during the civil war between Stephen and Maud. With his son the heir to Bretagne, Conan (IV) D.Bretagne 1156 the earldom, but not always the honour, of Richmond, became hereditary in the ducal family. Pierre 'mauelcere' (d.1250), younger brother of Robert (III) C.Dreux, married Alix, cognatic granddaughter and heiress of Conan (IV). His family held Bretagne until its final incorporation into France in 1514. The Dreux arms went out of use early, being replaced by the ermine but the title was used intermittently, e.g. by Arthur dit comte de Richemont (o.s.p.1458), connetable de France and duke 1457. Simon Montagu of Boughton, d.<1390, younger son of John 1st baron Monthermer [343] and Margaret Monthermer, married Elisabeth Boughton. The Montagus of Boughton and Monthermer items are overlapping and confusing. This blazon refers to his uncle, William E.Salisbury [138], i.e. Montagu qfg Man, which gives little meaning, so it has been emended as noted. The 'John' in the armorials and seal might refer to John 2nd baron, and not to Simon. The Monthermer line [281], founded by Ralph, a natural son who married first the Joan 'of Acre', daughter of Edward I and widow of Gilbert Clare E.Gloucester & Hertford, and secondly the sister of Aymer de Valence E.Pembroke, became extinct with Thomas, 2nd baron and father of Margaret. Item [174] is otherwise known as the arms of Edward (o.s.p.>1348), brother of Thomas, with "son of Joan of Acre" added later in some armorials.
